Handling the increasing motor car population is a problem facing all of Australia's major cities today.

Adelaide is no exception, and despite its wide streets the traffic situation is fast reaching the stage where many shoppers despair having to visit the city, particularly on Saturday mornings.

Because of this it has, in recent years, become fashionable for people to shop in their own suburbs at centres offering the same variety of goods and services as the city, without its traffic snarls and parking problems. The Myer Emporium's Tea Tree Gully Plaza is just such a centre.

It sets bold new standards in Australian retailing, and gives the variety offered by one huge department store, two supermarkets, and almost 40 shops - all in air-conditioned comfort.

The Tea Tree Gully Plaza also has car parking for more than 2,000 cars.

And because this $12M. dollar complex is only a 15 minute drive from the city, it will service not only people living in the north-eastern suburbs but people throughout the metropolitan area.

It is an outstanding project, I wish it every success.
